portunities to unify in recent years, and the time was right for Montgomery and Schenectady to look at the benefits of working as one agency.

"We're leveraging the experience and expertise of our staff members to provide the very best for the people in our programs today and in the decades ahead," Saunders said in the release. "We know that the heart of this unification is a mutual respect for people with disabilities and a desire to support each person's hopes, dreams, and ambitions so that everyone can live a quality of life that each person values."

Plans for unification were first announced last summer, and the agency worked with families and people supported to answer questions and ensure a seamless transition.

Services to the people we support transitioned smoothly through the unification, and the agency will continue to maintain a footprint in both counties.

Immediately following the professional activity, the theater will show the movie "Matilda: The Musical," which is free thanks to underwriting by the Perrott, Peck, and Blackmon families.

"As the networking event is being rotated through Downtown Gloversville venues, so are the times it is being held so all businesses can have an opportunity to connect with other professionals," Donovan said in a news release.

44 Lakes Customized Gifts & Décor hosted the first one in February and Mohawk Harvest Cooperative Market championed the March event, both held first thing in the morning, Donovan explained. "EmpowHERing Designs took April's event and held it in the late afternoon. This one at The Glove Theatre is at night and right before a free movie, showcasing the historic theater. What better way to meet other business owners than to enjoy an evening out and learning more about the Downtown Gloversville community?" Donovan said.

While this event is geared towards Downtown Gloversville businesses and organizations, any business is welcome to attend and network.

"The idea is to have a monthly coffee break for businesspeople to meet other members of the business community, network, and visit a business that they may not have been in yet," said Donovan in the release. "Thank you to the staff and board of directors at The Glove Theatre for hosting May's location."
